

RED ARMOUR HALTED

This photograph appears to show the Red express halted and damaged by the Polish forces of the Mad Baron. Meanwhile fighting continued around the region.

Whilst the Reds and Poles were at each others throats Ming was busy teaching Andrei Tomski the errors of his ways by gunning down large numbers of his troops whilst doing nothing to prevent the Red forces of Krasny Davidovitch Imreiski from also joining in the slaughter. By the end of day the White force was finished as a fighting force. The other White force of Count Deadovitch had taken a leisurely cross country march and seemed to be in no hurry to help out his fellow countrymen and in fact looked as if they were going to attack the Chinese forces of Ming rather than their erstwhile enemies, the Reds. This plan quickly changed when from what had been supposed were Turkish ships moored in the river large numbers of Japanese troops disembarked and made an unopposed landing on the riverbank.

With enemy troops on his front, flank and rear Ming was now in a precarious position and the only solution was to send his small gunboat against the larger ship to try and hold the Japanese. It quickly became apparent that the Japanese and British/Whites were now in cahoots as both their naval craft quickly took on and sunk the Shou Tou.
