

MONKS GUNNED DOWN BY ARMY OF GOD

Although the Bolsheviks made sure no photographs were taken of them shooting the monks this terrible image of their troops gunning down civilians in Samarkand shows exactly what they are capable of.

The British troops supporting Count Yuri Deadovitch were also to receive the full wrath of Bolshevik brutality later in the day. It would appear that the Bolshevik troops of Krasny Davidovitch Imreisk, which were in league with the Army of God had managed to get hold of a mad scientist Al Einstein, who had perfected some chemical weapons. A number of gas shells were fired at the British troops which caused considerable casualties and confusion in the ranks as none of the troops had gas respirators with them.

For two days mayhem had been taking place all around him and the local Basmachi leader Yesai Khan based in Samarkand had tried to avoid bloodshed and spent the time making alliances with all the various factions surrounding the town, it's just a pity he hadn't looked to his own people as an insurrection broke out and various parts of the town were held. His next big mistake was to ask Baron Rypyerheidov for help and gave him permission to pass through the town but it would be the next day before he saw the errors of his ways.

As dawn broke on the third day, dazed monks gingerly made their way down from their burning monastery only to be met by Bolshevik troops supporting the 'Army of God'.

After shouting at them in Russian a language none of the monks could speak, the Bolshevik troops then shot all of them in the back, proceeded to strip them and loot their meagre belongings. Not content with that outrage the Russians then burst into the monastery and ransacked it for any valuables.
